WIFI

David walked into the kitchen, looking angry. His Grandmother, who was visiting, was at the sink washing the lunch dishes. She looked at him and frowned. "What's wrong, Davy?"

"The WiFi crashed and I was doing my homework. I was right in the middle of looking up information on types of communication. I have a report due next week."

His Grandmother looked confused. "What's a WiFi, dear? Is that an encyclopedia?"

Now David looked confused. "You don't know what WiFi is? Grandma, how do you get online?"

Grandma dried her hands and sat down at the table. "Davy, I don't know what you're talking about. Is getting online a computer thing? I don't have a computer."

David sat down at the table, and asked, "But how do you talk to your friends?" "I go to their house, or they come to mine, and we visit one another. Or I call my friends on the telephone. Sometimes I write them a letter or send them a card." "You don't Skype or IM them? You don't talk to them on Facebook?" "Honey, I don't even know what those things are."

Looking shocked, David said, "That's how I talk to my friends. But I can't do any of it without WiFi. That's how you use Skype, or message or Facebook. It's how I find things out, like ways to communicate. But if the WiFi isn't working, I can't do any of it."

David's grandmother smiled. "Honey, we just sat here and named several different ways to communicate, right now, and we didn't even use this WiFi of yours. Can you name them?" David thought long and hard. Finally, he counted on his fingers as he said, "you said you visit your friends... you call them on the phone... you write them letters. Then I said I Skype, message and use Facebook. That's six different ways that we can communicate." Then he smiled. "I can think of one more." Grandmother asked, "What's that?"

"I can learn things by talking to my Grandma!"
